What Is the Future of Our National Economy?

(1) When we have won this war, what steps will it be necessary to take to avoid repetition of the errors of the past peace?

(2) Assuming that we may have to play the part of a world policeman to keep dangerous tools from people who have misused them, what must our attitude be toward international trade so as to insure the good will of people in the economic have-not countries, and at the same time keep the job of policing conquered countries from becoming impossible for our military forces?

(3) If it becomes necessary, in order to insure bargaining power for the U. S. on the world markets, to have an increased amount of direction of business and enterprise here at home, how can this be done without impairing individual liberties?

(4) Would it be possible to base our agricultural economy on a system of subsidized consumption of food products, rather than continue on the competitive price system?

(5) What part will nutrition play in the post-war world?

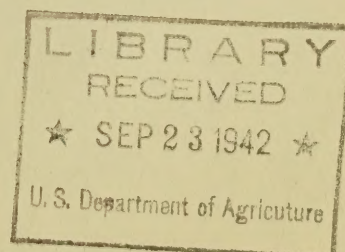

(6) Can technological developments in agriculture be used to the fullest extent without impairing the ideal of the "family-sized" farm?

(7) Once the aftermath of the second World War has permitted Europe, Asia, and the other deficiency food-producing countries to rebuild their production facilities, what will happen to farming in this country?

(8) How shall we meet the problem of increasing agricultural expansion in Latin America and the competition for foreign markets which we may expect from these countries?

(9) What can be done in the way of decentralizing industry so as to give more people in rural communities an opportunity to be gainfully employed?

(10) How can the agricultural population insure continued political equality with the large urban population?
